Energizer announces new button battery packaging

By Vicki Louk Balint | October 15, 2012

According to a recent CDC report, the number of children injured from swallowing coin lithium, or “button” batteries continues to rise. Recently, Energizer, a leading manufacturer of the batteries, announced a new child-resistant packaging designed to reduce the occurrence of battery ingestion.

The new packaging meets guidelines set by the Consumer Product Safety Commission for child-resistant packaging. Energizer says the packaging is made from durable and flexible materials, making it extremely difficult for a young child to open.

The company acknowledges that accidental button battery ingestions has been on the rise. Stacey Harbour, U.S. director of marketing for Energizer, points to National Capital Poison Center data findings showing that the number of cases in which children have been seriously hurt or died has more than quadrupled in the past five years compared to the previous five years. “We also know,” says Harbour, “that a little over eight percent of all ingestions comes from packaging, and while the majority of incidents are due to loose batteries or children getting them out of devices, we don’t want to see one child injured by a button battery ingestion.”

Button battery packaging will feature new icons to remind adults of the danger of ingesting a coin cell battery along with information on how to get help if one is swallowed.

Batteries will be produced with a sticker on the back of the battery itself. Energizer hopes the warnings will serve as an additional reminder to keep batteries away from young children. The packaging is set to appear in the near future at retail stores nationwide.

Karla Rauch, of Emmett’s Fight Foundation says that she is pleased at the efforts of the company, and hopes that the act of physically peeling the warning sticker off will increase the chances that consumers will take precautions.

Rauch, whose son Emmett has undergone multiple surgeries after swallowing a button battery from a remote control device as a toddler, says she appreciates the warning label urging immediate medical attention if a battery is swallowed.

After swallowing occurs, button batteries can begin burning the throat, esophagus, or other tissues in the body within just a few hours. Often, the batteries are so small the a child may not choke or indicate other immediate signals of distress.

How would you know if your child swallowed a button battery? Read more about Emmett and the Rauch family’s story.

Rauch thinks the packaging changes are a move in the right direction, but she says she’d also like to see a screw that secures the door to any button battery.
Energizer announces new button battery packaging

compartment.

She’s also hoping to to build a non-profit organization to raise awareness of the dangers of button battery ingestion and to support families affected.

Energizer has begun working with Safe Kids Worldwide, recently launching The Battery Controlled, a campaign to raise awareness and share prevention and treatment tips for parents and caregivers.

Tags: button batteries, CDC, Consumer Product Safety Commission, emmett rauch, emmett’s fight, energizer, karla rauch, national poison center

Vicki Louk Balint

Multimedia journalist Vicki Louk Balint covers health issues for RAISING ARIZONA KIDS magazine.

LEAVE A REPLY

Name (required)

Mail (will not be published) (required)

Website

Comments

SUBMIT COMMENT

RAK GIVEAWAYS

“This is 40” movie sneak preview

This is marriage….this is family…this is work….this is life…This is 40. From writer/director/producer Judd Apatow comes the sort-of-sequel to “Knocked-Up” with Paul Rudd, Leslie Mann, Melissa McCarthy and Megan Fox. “This is 40,” is an original comedy that expands upon the story of Pete (Paul Rudd) and Debbie (Leslie Mann) from the blockbuster hit “Knocked […]

Learn more

A North Pole Experience VIP event at Ice Den

Ice Den, 18-Degrees Neighborhood Grill and North Pole Experience are hosting a VIP event that will really get you in the holiday spirit! A select group of families will enjoy dinner, a movie and ice skating — at no charge! RAISING ARIZONA KIDS has tickets for five families of four. The event will be held [...]